Local Law Enforcement Strategies: Technology and New Management Models

Communities are working to find ways of maintaining law enforcement services during a time of shrinking resources – both human and financial. Law enforcement is a critical need for all community stake holders. The traditional service model in New Jersey is heavily reliant on establishing a local department and staffing it based on numbers of calls and population. Now new models are being developed to take advantage of state of art technologies and management techniques to deliver sustainable levels of service within the resources available.

This is a valuable educational event for local policy makers, community leaders concerned about law enforcement, public safety practitioners, and anyone who needs to learn how law enforcement will be possible in a time of shrinking resources.
